

First Lines Friday

Happy Friday!

I saw a great Friday feature post today and I want to join in. It's a fun way to glimpse a book without the cover or blurb – it looks at the first lines instead! The opening lines of a book are so crucial and are often incredibly impactful and intriguing.

So let's get started!

- Pick a book off your shelf and open to the first page.
- Copy the first few lines without giving the book away.
- Reveal the book

The first Callanish knew of the Circus Excalibur was the striped silk of their sails against the grey sky. They approached her tiny island in convoy: the main boat with its bobbing trail of canvas-covered coracles following like ducklings, chained in an obedient line.

The book is....

The Gracekeepers by Kirsty Logan!

This is one of my absolute favourite books. I love it. I have read it twice and presented an assessment on it for uni. I highly recommend you pick it up. I have a review that you can check out here.

This is a such a fun post idea. It's a great prompt to look through the books on your shelf and share such an important part of a book...the first lines! I'd love to start doing this feature post regularly.

I saw it today on Lisa's Books, Gems and Tarot blog. It is hosted by Wandering Words.

I hope you all have a fantastic weekend.

Happy reading, and enjoy pondering those first lines of the next book you pick up!
